CHAPTER XLIV.

Chadwin—I mean the real one—said to ma," she mused.

"He did!"

"Tes, and the way things have turned out it would seem"—

Helen stopped and covered her face with her hands. Sadie ran to her and put her arms about her.

"Tou are going to help us, aren't you, Helen dear!" said Sadie tremulously.
"I would tell Auntle about it, only she would want a tremendous wedding and all that. Whitney and I both hate hig weddings. I am too timid and he is too nervous—say he might swallow the ring and choke to death. You will now, Helen darling."

There was a little sob in Sadie's voice

Marietta swallowed her sigh and clasped her hand over her paipitating heart.

The young man was not alone, however, and he did not deign Miss Featherington a glance as he held the door open and cried:

"Come in, children!"

The children were none other than the mand sadie and Travers Gladwin. Nor did they deign Miss Featherington a glance as he held the door open and cried:

There was a little sob in Sadie's voice and Helen surrendered.

"You are doing a very rash thing, sadie," Helen lectured, striving to draw her brows into an expression of impressive solamnity. "My own terrible experience should have been a lesson to you—a warning—a—""

"But it was Whitney Barnes who saved you, Helen!" cried Sadie, extiliantly. "You owe it all to him and that is why I began to love him!"

"Monesnee!" retorted Helen sharply. "Mr. Barnes had nothing whatever to do with it, All he did was to get himself unlocked."

"But it, All he did was to get himself handcuffed and run about absurdly trying to set himself unlocked."

"But he was on watch and planned, "Sadie defended her hero."

Sadie Burton," she added, "that you fell in love with that young man in a few hours—you, the man-hater."

"Y-y-yes," admitted Sadie, her cheeks again on fire.

"And a man you don't know anything shout—a perfect stranger!"

This brought the fire into the timid misse eyes and she returned warmly:

"I know everything about him, Heien Burton—his whole family history, and he is only obeying orders in rushing the ceremony."

"Yes, his father commanded him to marry me at once—and if he doesn't obey he will be disimherited and have to become a plumber or something to make a living. His father is Joshua Barnes, the mustard king—you must have heard of him. "Why, I never heard of such a thing. Sadie. He could not have been serious. His father never saw you in his life."

"Oh, but he telephoned his father all about it before he proposed to me. He was sure I would say yes. He is a wonderful mind reader and believes in mysteries and Fate. He said the mysteries and Fate. He said the mysteries and Fate. He said the minute he saw me he knew I was his Fate."

All's Not Gold

That Glitters BEWARE OF COUNTERFEIT CLOTHING Did you ever stand on a Broadway corner and study the clothing of the men that pass? If so, you have seen the "shrinks," the baggy knees, the drooping collars, the faded colors, the wobbly trouser leg, the short sleevesproduct of either the "ready-made" stores or of the "loud-shouting" tailor who has his garments made by machinery at cheap manufactories where materials are cut like a tramp saws wood, where patterns are never matched, where shrinking of goods is unknown, where tailoring, in its true sense, is like Greek or algebra to a kindergarten pupil.
